Quantification of the venous hemodynamic response to a lower extremity exercise program using real-time three-dimensional ultrasound: a pilot study. Quantification of the venous hemodynamic response to exercise could provide a means to monitor the effects of a program on venous blood volume. Real-time three-dimensional (3D) ultrasound can be used to noninvasively quantify changes in leg volumes caused by exercise. Twenty healthy females (average age: 32 +/- 8.6 yr) who self-reported being active participated in this pilot study. Transverse plane imaging of the right and left lower extremities was performed before and after 30 min of exercise at the midhigh level (dynamic knee extension) with the subjects in the supine position. Leg volume changes were quantified by multiplying the average volume in two regions of interest: the entire leg and the legs' proximal third. Volume changes were calculated by subtracting pre-exercise volumes from postexercise volumes. Femoral vein diameters were also quantified using real-time 3D ultrasound in the same time period. Significant changes in femoral vein diameter as well as lower leg volumes were present after the exercise protocol. Mean circumference and volume changes in the lower legs after exercise were 27.3 +/- 5.9 mm and 14.2 +/- 2.9 ml, respectively. Positive correlations were present between percentage volume change for the entire lower extremity ($r = 0.739$, P Increased susceptibility of airway smooth muscle cells to steroid-induced cell death by tumour necrosis factor-related apoptosis-inducing ligand and hydrogen peroxide. Pro-inflammatory cytokines such as tumour necrosis factor-alpha and interferon-gamma induce apoptosis of airway smooth muscle cells (ASMCs). With the recent success of tumour necrosis factor-related apoptosis-inducing ligand (TRAIL) in cancer therapy, we tested the hypothesis that TRAIL may be a useful therapeutic agent for ASMCs. Exposure of ASMCs to TRAIL for 8 h induced apoptosis in
